The world has never seen a pandemic as the one caused by Covid-19. Although seafarers are at the forefront of the battle against the virus, they also face new challenges not related to the virus itself. One of the things to be considered is that isolation on board a vessel is not the same as isolation at home. When the pandemic started it did not take long for cruise vessels and the disembarking of persons on board. Cruises were cancelled due to the large number of persons carried on board. Ports began refusing entry to passengers and ships due to the risk of contamination, many ports were refusing disembarkation and were limiting the number of persons allowed to disembark, and some have unfortunately taken their own lives.

Keeping safe despite Covid-19

Shore leave is provided for in Regulation 2.4.2 of the Maritime Labour Convention 2006. However, Covid-19 has disrupted this right, as the risk of contamination makes it impossible to disembark seafarers. From the beginning of the pandemic, seafarers were not allowed to disembark, which meant that they were still only partially crewing vessels. This has been especially hard to handle as seafarers are not allowed to work for more than 12 months on board, so it is common for seafarers to be crewed for one year and then sent home to disembark. However, due to the pandemic, seafarers were not allowed to disembark, which led to seafarers being stranded on board for more than one year. This has led to seafarers being deprived of sufficient rest and contact with family. Moreover, due to the threat of contamination, many ports were refusing disembarkation and were limiting the number of persons allowed to disembark. This has led to seafarers being stranded on board for more than one year.

One of the things to be considered is that isolation on board a vessel is not the same as isolation at home. When the pandemic started it did not take long for cruise vessels and the disembarking of persons on board. Cruises were cancelled due to the large number of persons carried on board. Ports began refusing entry to passengers and ships due to the risk of contamination, many ports were refusing disembarkation and were limiting the number of persons allowed to disembark, and some have unfortunately taken their own lives.

The “Miracle Hope”

Trafigura Maritime Logistics Pte Ltd v Clearlake Shipping Pte Ltd (The “Miracle Hope”)

The “Miracle Hope” case was decided in Singapore by Justice Tan Kee Teck. The case involved a dispute between Trafigura Maritime Logistics Pte Ltd and Clearlake Shipping Pte Ltd. The dispute arose from a charter party agreement for the hire of a vessel.
